ANARCHIST ON RACE MIXING:

I am not here to discuss morality, only benefit.

It goes without saying, that love of your own culture does not necessitate the hatred of others. I think one of the most beautiful things about being human is that different cultures exist. Yes, this is influenced by my love of language learning. It's genuinely fascinating to learn about how perspectives on time, color, money, women, men, and other things, are different in each culture via their vocabulary and grammatical structure. It's also really cool that different foods exist, and different traditional fashions, and so on and so forth.

I want to preface this by stating that I understand our current form of society, and why people do the things that they do. We live in an increasingly globalized world. In America, half of your neighbors can be somebody of a different race, so the likelihood of falling in love, or even just having sex with somebody of a different race, is higher than it otherwise would be. If a man falls in love with his childhood best friend that happens to be a black woman, I understand that. I'm not here to moralize over the decisions people make, just noting which ones are actually beneficial to others and the individual.

I also want to preface this by acknowledging how mentally ill the online right is. Everywhere I look on twitter, far right accounts run by white and indian men will post and think more about black men's penises than the porn actress that the (likely jewish) casting director hired. I understand that there IS pathology to this conversation online. However, I do not have that pathology. I am an anarchist woman.

My argument is as follows: Race-mixing destroys culture. Culture is a good (beneficial) thing. Therefore, race-mixing is harmful.

It is easy to understand how race-mixing destroys culture. Imagine you are an Englishman, and you have kids with an indigenous woman from North America. What is the actual likelihood that those half-native children will speak the language of the mother well enough to pass it on? Near zero. This is not only because the Englishman has likely moved the native woman over to his English society, which is common in mixed race couples due to how relationships work logistically, but because in order to maintain connection to a culture the child either:

a) needs to interact with it on a regular basis within society or

b) needs to interact with it on a regular basis within the household.

If this Indigenous-English couple were to move to say, Germany, the child would then lose the culture of both the mother and the father. He would be incentivized to only speak German, as he would not be able to listen to his parents speak English, or the indigenous language together for his ears to pick up on it and learn the language. The likelihood of the English-indigenous parents being able dedicate copious amounts of time speaking with their kid in their respective native languages, for the child to only be able to speak with that one person, and for the child to retain this ability instead of losing it to the broader society in which they live, is extremely low.

I know this from personal experience as well. I am 100% Albanian, and both my parents speak Albanian frequently. I can understand and speak Albanian, DESPITE 95% of my day being with interaction with the English language via my consumption of media and interaction with society. I don’t watch Youtube videos in Albanian or go to any kind of Albanian church. If only one of my parents were Albanian, I would not have this gift.

In an increasingly globalized society, where immigrants from all around the world decide to settle in the same place, it is impossible to build enough cultural centers to maintain everybody’s half-household culture.

I want to bring up the distinction of the USA as a “melting pot” vs as a “salad bowl.” I understand that immigrants will always exist in the USA, but the ways in which they integrate into our societies differ. The first model is as a “melting pot”, where all these vastly different kinds of people are just placed right next to each other, leading to the cultural loss I described prior. The second is as a salad bowl, where distinct, ethnically homogeneous communities form, seen in New York with “Little Italy” and “Chinatown.” Imagine if every Chinese woman in Chinatown married a non-Chinese. That would no longer be Chinatown. Within the context of this current form of society, I promote the “salad bowl” model for both short-term and long-term collective benefit, and long-term individual benefit. Namely, that it’ll be far easier for you to maintain a marriage with your partner, and you don’t have to suffer through seeing your kids have an identity crisis, which is a documented phenomenon among mixed-race individuals. Mixed-race youth have significantly higher depression rates than mono-racial peers.

You can say “that’s because mixed-race kids don’t get enough support!” but that’s radlib coping. People want to belong to a group. It’s not 'racism', it’s a basic human need for cultural anchoring.

It is important to note, that the technological progress that brought about these mass immigration patterns, is something that requires authority to exist. Multi-national corporations that hire foreign workers require authority to exist. The existence of airplanes to move people around? That requires authority to exist. If governments and advanced technology didn't exist, we'd all be living in ethnically homogeneous tribes right now.

Not only that, but I believe in free association. Forcing people to live among foreigners is extremely authoritarian. It requires authority to force me to speak to people of other races and cultures against my will when I do not want to. This is in line with my anarchist beliefs. These extremely multi-cultural societies are an authoritarian creation.

Yes, if one of my parents were German instead of, say, black, the same loss of my Albanian heritage would occur, but it would be far less disastrous from a personal point of view. As an Albanian woman, I have far more in common with your average German man than I do any African. European DNA clusters closely together, even among different phenotypes (germanic vs southern Mediterranean), along with certain cultural values and behaviors exhibited by high trust societies. It may shock many suburbanite Americans to learn, that not every culture politely waits in line. A lot of them just crowd around the street vendor. I don't date outside my group, and I think people underestimate how common and powerful that preference actually is. Even dating app data, filled with people most exposed to advertising and media, shows overwhelming same-race preference across groups, even when people say they are open to other races. It's not hate- it's pattern recognition. No amount of mixed-race pornography or advertising will change that 50,000 years of evolution.

Corporate advertisers push mixed-race imagery relentlessly because it sells a deracinated, frictionless consumer identity. They profit from erasing the tribal distinctions that made cultures distinct in the first place.

Thankfully, we don't have to fall in line.
